The Pollution–Productivity Curve:
Non-Linear Effects and Adaptation in High-Pollution Environments (Job Market Paper) Link to PDF
with F. Usmani, Global Energy Alliance for People and Planet

Abstract. This paper studies whether workers adapt to air pollution using ball-by-ball data from Indian cricket, where match schedules and training locations generate variation in exposure. A 10 $\mu g\,m^{-3}$ increase in match-day $PM_{2.5}$ reduces bowlers' performance relative to batters' by about 1 percent. This effect is statistically significant only in the top pollution quintile (over 5 times the U.S. annual average), although we cannot reject a linear dose–response. Higher exposure in the prior month attenuates this effect, consistent with adaptation, but lowers performance by more than attenuation offsets. Results suggest lowering baseline pollution, not merely averting extremes, yields productivity gains.
